From "Linguistic and Blasphemous Aspects of Bavarian Micturition and American Toilet Names" by Reinhold Aman

Bavarians use several terms for to urinate, depending on the force, diameter and volume of the urinary stream. They don't use standard German terms such as harnen and urinieren, or North German terms such as pinkeln and pissen. Instead, they choose one of the following five terms:

bisln

to urinate like a child, with a weak, thin, low-pressure stream. Since the 1970s also used euphemistically by adults, as in English to tinkle, to go pee-pee, to piddle.

bruntzn

to urinate extensively with a broad, strong stream like a horse, cow, woman, or beer-filled man. Cf. the American expressions It's raining like a cow pissing on a flat rock and to piss like a race horse.

schiffa

to urinate extensively and urgently with a strong stream. From North German colloquial schiffen.

soacha

to urinate with a fairly thin, sharp, high-pressure stream like a male dog or young fellow.

zinsln

to urinate like a youngster, but with more pressure and quantity than bisln. Also used euphemistically like English to tinkle.

This brings me to designations used on toilet doors that are just as puzzling to non-natives as the Icelandic ones were to me. For MEN and WOMEN or GENTS and LADIES one finds "cute" ones, such as POINTERS and SETTERS or BUCKS and DOES in rural lodges, BUOYS and GULLS in seafood restaurants, and earthy ones, such as SHAKERS and WIPERS. If you have seen similar toilet names, please send them to me (including in other languages, with literal translations into English), noting the place where you found them. Your contributions will appear in our next volume.
